

A Walk Through The Storm (revised): A story of loss and rainbows

A Walk Through the Storm is a labor of love, a collaboration of families coming together to share their stories of love and loss. The stories all begin the same, you wake up, you discover you're pregnant and are overjoyed by the news. You plan; you dream and prepare for the future arrival of this new bundle of joy. For some months go by and everything is perfect, for others on this journey the time is much shorter. You've heard those words that no parent wishes to ever hear. I'm sorry, there is no heartbeat. What do you do now, where do you turn? Who will help you through this journey? Sadly, Pregnancy and Infant Loss occurs more than people would like to think. However, due to society's views on child death, those numbers are silent. We're taught, or rather it's ingrained in us that it's one of those things you just don't talk about. Some believe it's too hurtful for the family if you mention it, others just simply believe that the less said the better. In this book you will find the stories of families wishing to break that silence, to tell society that it's okay to openly grieve, talk and love their child's memory. They have buried their child and their plans for the future that child would have had. They know firsthand, how painful it can be to see the looks in the faces of others when they talk about those children. To hear the whispers behind their back from those who think it is time for them to move on. Move On, what is that? There truly is no moving on or getting over the death of a child. It is a lifelong journey, one that is fraught with potholes, cliffs, ledges of mountains that they each must walk in their own time and space. They will never get over the loss of their child, they will only learn with time, to accept that loss as a part of who they are now. They will never be the same person they were before hand, as they now know that each life is even more precious than jewels. As they walk this journey, they will find that old friends will slip away from their new lives, but new friends will emerge. Friends, who will be there walking the path with them, friends who understand their pain even if their story for how they started this journey is different. A wise woman once told me, There is no greater pain than the loss of a child. Its a pain you never fully accept, you just learn to live with it. You learn that it makes you who you are, who you want to be in the future. Its the love of a Mother that is ingrained in us that we never let go of our children whether they are with us or not, and what you do with that love is up to us. That wise woman was my Great Aunt, whose son was born prematurely and died just hours afterwards, to this day, she still grieves, she still mourns and she still visits and calls him her son. I hope as you read these stories, whether you have lost a child or not, you will learn from them. You will take in what each of these families have to say about how hard it truly is to lose a child and to know how to deal with that loss. Society doesnt need to dictate how we as parents deal with the loss of our children anymore. Its time to take a stand, to be the voice for the voiceless, to proudly wear our love for our children on our hearts. Each child you read about in this book has a story to tell, one that was cut short. Who knows one of these children may have been destined for greatness; one could have been a musician, an artist, a scientist. We dont know because our children were taken from us before they even had a chance to know life outside the womb. These are our children, our stories of loss and love but most importantly they are our stories of hope and renewal. Our renewal in hope of changing societys views while helping grieving families to know they are not alone. Our hope to leave a legacy behind for our children, that they, themselves could not leave behind. This is their footprint on the world.
