

REH #2

Lifelong Robert E Howard fan Brian John Mitchell teams up with cartoonist Andrew White to make speculative biography tales of the worlds best pulp writer taking care of his ailing mother. This second issue of the Robert E. Howard bio-fic comic is very tightly focused on a single incident. It starts as a narrative of the the authors daily quality of life and transforms into a prayer for his mother. This is an evocative little comic, thirty-two pages of emotional tension, and it does a fantastic job of conveying Howards fragile mental state. I have no idea the extent of Brian John Mitchells research and sources on this project, but I am finding it to be compelling material. If nothing else, Mitchell has a tremendous empathetic sense of his subject. The art here is a mix of naturalistic sketches of the characters and locations of the story, and minimalistic panels consisting of only words and a bit of rhythmic mark making a scattering of scratches at the page. I can tell I am doing a poor job of describing it, but the effect it had on me was to give me the sense of the desperation Howard may have felt in his efforts to keep his mother alive and as well as she ever could be. I think one of the functions of biographical work is to establish a sense of scale between the reader and the subject of the biography. Silber Medias R.E.H. series seems to be placing Robert E. Howard in very ordinary human light, in that we are getting to know a man who dealt with a bouquet of family issues, as so many of us do. He is a very relatable character in this sense, a person who has experiences that many of us can fathom. Meanwhile, the magnitude of those struggles, and the depth of impact this has on Howards life, is also showcased. For example, most of us have or will lose one or both of our parents. Not all of us will feel that as keenly as losing everything, which is the role of Robert Howards mother in this series. She is his life. Are you amazed to see that so much as been conveyed in a couple of tiny little mini-comics? You should be. Hustle on over to Silber Media and check out the offerings. ~ Holly von Winckel, Sequential Tart
