

Manpower (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Manpower At the request of the Commandant I have prepared this book for use at the United States Military Academy and designed it for use in informal discussions rather than in recitations. We believe that excellence in the art of handling men is a prime requirement for army officers; and that it can be had only from an intimate personal understanding of the principles involved, not from blindly following rules. A good leader of men is one whose impulses are right; and these impulses come from a genuine acceptance of principles, from ones own beliefs, feelings, and experiences. We believe this capacity may be best reached through personal thought and experience brought out by informal discussion. Blank pages have been inserted to give instructors and students opportunity to make any notes which may be of peculiar personal value. The late war has again proved that machines and cold science cannot win alone. They may test mans endurance almost to the limit, but in the end superior manpower wins. It is the fiber of our manpower that counts. And this fiber is the peculiar care of the psychological part of soldiering - of leadership.
