Charles Oliver is a psychology experiment. Dr David Cleminson, a surgeon, his friend and mentor. The doctor fears for Charles` safety and kidnaps him from the hands of ruthless experimenters. The question is how much have the psychologists messed with his mind and how much of himself is left. Charles` world is coloured with abstract observations causing a constant battle with his perception of reality. He is a man who had no name until the world gave him one. Arctic hunter or suburban troll, in what and whose world does he really belong. Are the scientists trying to discover something or obsessed with control. A primitive survival instinct and distant sixth sense cannot be reconditioned as he fights accepted conformity. The couple try to go it alone and survive each other. Their relationship eventually breaks down as they are torn between differing objectives and paranoia. Hard on their heels bureaucrats are trying to reel their science experiment back in. Dr Cleminson vanishes but the police have no knowledge of his existence. Likewise Charles only has an identity which the psychologists have given him. He becomes a tormented soul who does not know who is. He constantly searches for truth and becomes obsessed with finding David. Forced to go it alone Charles starts to break down. He is not equipped to deal with the mystery of society. He refuses to give up searching. The more questions he asks the more confusing his situation becomes. He struggles between naive joviality and depths of degradation and despair. Gradually confusion borders into an insanity workout. His battle for identity and independence crumble to hopelessness. In desperation and beyond self help he searches for answers in drink. This outlet is denied when assumed he has made a bizarre surreal suicide attempt. As usual the authorities fail to understand. For his own safety he is put in an asylum. This does nothing to solve his torment putting him back in the hands of experimenters. This time their weapons are drugs pushing him to the edge of the meaning of lunacy. His mind wanders through a surreal world in an attempt to balance out the reality of physical confinement. Finally reoccurring themes overwhelm him. He is no closer to finding his identity or reasons for the experiments. In a last glimpse of reality he thinks he has found David. But is it too late or can he just hang on until daylight. Are his initials a clue to identity or is he suffering a twentieth century overdose. Put this down because you could be next.
